The presence and magnitude of differences in peripheral autonomic nervous system (PANS) functioning was investigated in a group of medication-free patients with chronic fatigue syndrome (CFS) and a matched control group. Subjects participated in a 3-min rating task of one of three facial expressions (fear, sadness, and surprise) as well as a relaxation condition. Heart rate, R-R interval, and breathing rate during each condition were monitored by Polar electrocardiographic (ECG) equipment. Frequency domain analysis of heart rate variability was used to measure the magnitude of differences in PANS functioning between patients and controls. Both the CFS and the control groups demonstrated higher values for the relative high-frequency power (0.15-0.4 Hz) of heart rate variability in response to the task as compared with the baseline conditions. However, the CFS group demonstrated a significantly increased power for the 0.15-0.4-Hz band as compared with the controls when viewing emotion-eliciting stimuli (fear and sadness), and for the task in general. No significant differences in R-R interval or breathing rate were demonstrated between the groups. In this group of medication-free CFS patients, there were higher levels of sympathetic hyperactivity as demonstrated by increased cardiac sympathetic nervous system (SNS) activity, as compared with controls. These findings may contribute to our understanding of the pathophysiology of CFS, as well as the development of new treatment strategies. Q: Python reading multiple.csv files from a folder I have
