But in recent weeks, the site has increasingly found itself at the forefront of news headlines for all the wrong reasons. On November 15, Reddit users were shocked to find one of their own making a strange post in the r/The_Donald subreddit. This post, "Did the election result in California indicate a desire to be less white?" appeared below the post "Hillary Clinton would be a great president," Reddit rules state that posts encouraging "racial, religious, or similar violence, discrimination, or hostility are not permitted." The user who wrote "Did the election result in California indicate a desire to be less white?" was immediately banned. "The idea that you're going to come to r/The_Donald and ask if people want to 'be less white,' is so weird," user Redditor ihateittalkingtome said. The Donald is an important subreddit on Reddit. It boasts almost a quarter million subscribers and is frequented by many of Donald Trump's supporters. However, as the controversy continued to bubble over the weekend, users were convinced that the post did not come from a Trump supporter and was intentionally racist. On Saturday, the post was shared on both r/The_Donald and r/president trump, with many of the latter's users expressing concerns. "Seriously, dude," user ridiculous_mac said on the Trump subreddit. "The fact that this even exists, let alone that someone would think to post this, is disgusting and people should know better." But the post did not have to be removed in one day. On Saturday evening, Redditor ihateittalkingtome announced that the post had been edited and would not appear
