R2's look just like my. Accureview is a program that I used to use on my (4.0) PC but the company I sell programs for (computers for children) is going to need to get me an email license. The "custom link" installs a "drop down list" in Word. Other people have this, too. The difference is, in this case, the "drop down list" replaces the menu item for "Print". I'm hoping someone has the same issue, otherwise I'll have to refund the fee. No, Accureview does not have email functionality. Sure, it can. The other problem is a very large consumer-based software company (Microsoft) recommends that all their software be installed using an OEM license from the OEM vendor. Yes. Note that multiple licenses are fine. Yes, but only the print version can be licensed this way (there is no e-mail license). Yep. The other problem is a very large consumer-based software company (Microsoft) recommends that all their software be installed using an OEM license from the OEM vendor. Yes. What you are going to do is essentially rip out the entire Accureview version you have and replace it with a new version in the same folder. If you get into either re-installing the program, or manually uninstalling, and then installing the same version that you replaced with, it will be the same version of
