Such an impact could be achieved by supporting the immediate opening of a wide range of post-disaster debris, significantly reducing the time required for disaster and natural-disaster recovery, and increasing the speed of rescue and recovery. To achieve this impact, the system must be highly sensitive, and able to distinguish signal from the complex background of an accident site. It must also be robust, convenient to use, low-cost, low-power, and able to operate with little operator interaction. This Phase I SBIR proposal is a continuation of our studies on the development of a system for rapid identification of human remains from a disaster site. Our Phase I studies will use a proof-of-concept (as opposed to a prototype) demonstration instrument based on a technology that uniquely enables our instrument to be sensitive at all depths, to operate in all environments, and to be also highly robust, as well as the use of adaptive optics. The system will demonstrate the potential of the technology to achieve the goals of the XERRA mission and enable scanning for identification and spatial mapping of the remains of human casualties in remote locations and disasters.Two-step calorimetric measurements of ion translocation 3e33713323
