In the future, some of the images stored on our hard drives will be able to detect the language that has been used to write them and use their own voice and tone. For example, images sent by our friends might show up with their own language on our desktop. Or, some of the images stored on the DVD that we put into our player might present with a picture of a dog instead of a sheep. What if we could make our own personal "collection" of images? Imagine if your collection of photos could speak to you? Microsoft Research [En] is a team of designers and computer scientists that has created the Speakr tool. It allows you to add your own audio clip to images stored on your hard drive. Naturally, the project is still in its early stages, but the results are very nice. Speakr, in action

Speakr is the result of an interest in combining audio and images. If you drag images into a window on the desktop, you will be asked what you want the audio clip to say to those pictures. You can set the default settings, so that the clips are saved with the same name and can be changed later. The new collections show up in a tree structure, as you can see in the example image. Speakr automatically applies the right audio file, as well as a suitable icon to the images. As well as this, you can view information about your new collection, which can be a bit confusing and unintuitive. You will need to access the Options panel to change the icons, make a keyboard shortcut to open the speakr window, remove the sample text and other options. So, on the whole, Speakr is a neat tool for people who are into pictures. And in a later version, it could get more useful if it came with a voice recognition software. In the future, we expect more to be added to this feature, such as the ability to add entire movies into a collection and to create a personal library of images, set as wallpaper on Windows.
