If your computer is using the Logitech MX 500 mouse, you can download and install the standard driver to help Windows recognize the mouse correctly. To use the Logitech MX 500 optical mouse, go to the Control Panel and open the Mouse category. Find the Logitech MX 500 in the list and click the Activate link. You will see that Windows 7 detects the mouse. You may still have problems using the mouse, in which case you will have to edit the system's registry and add some text. If you can't find your mouse in the list, click the Find My Mouse link. Open the Device Manager and look for a Logitech Mouse Optical device. If you see one, click the Device Setup link. Click the Mouse tab. Click the Properties button. Click the Driver tab. Click the Update button and select the Microsoft Windows 8, pre-installed optical mouse driver. Click the OK button. Serum markers of bone metabolism in the postmenopausal status. Postmenopausal osteoporosis is a very frequent and frequently severe disorder. Clinical and biochemical methods to estimate the risk of osteoporotic fracture include bone mineral density (BMD) measurements, risk factors (demographic, epidemiologic, and clinical data) for osteoporosis, and biochemical bone markers. To date, the established markers of bone turnover include serum osteocalcin and urinary N-telopeptides of type 1 collagen (NTx). Additional bone-specific markers include procollagen-I C-terminal propeptide (PICP) and aminoterminal propeptide of type 1 procollagen (PINP), which are secreted mainly by bone matrix. An ideal marker of bone turnover should be a unique index of skeletal remodeling. In this review, we describe the different indices of bone turnover, how they are affected by different pathologic conditions and drugs, the different bone turnover markers, and their role in the diagnosis and management of osteoporosis.
