Our lab studies the genes and proteins that regulate heart development and disease. The primary source of the enzyme GATA4 is in cardiac precursor cells. In the embryo, these cells become the cardiac muscle cells that contract to pump blood through the heart. They also form heart valves, regulate heart rhythm, and control how the heart grows. One or more mutations in GATA4 are the most common cause of a wide range of cardiac problems in children, including sudden cardiac death. Studies of these diseases have given us new insights into the basic biology of the heart, into its development, and into how mutations in the GATA4 gene can cause heart disease. This diagram shows a heart cell. The red box shows the heart region that is expanded in this image. Q: How do I use a shared DLL and Win32 libraries from a single DLL? I have a C# application that uses Win32 DLLs that I want to be shared across multiple targets. Response properties and the effects of neuromuscular blocking agents on single-cell EMG. Recent studies suggest that the electrophysiological properties of human motor units change after stimulation with specific neuromuscular blocking agents (NMBAs). The purpose of this study was to examine the effects of NMBAs on single-cell electromyographic (EMG) recordings of human motor units and to determine how these effects compare with motor-unit characteristics. In five healthy subjects, single motor units were isolated from the surface EMG signal of the flexor carpi radialis muscle by successive activation of motor units. EMG waveforms from each motor unit were recorded at baseline before and after application of various concentrations of rocuronium, vecuronium, or cisatracurium. After baseline recordings, single motor units were stimulated with a series of single pulses to determine the threshold, current, maximum upstroke velocity, maximum downstroke velocity, and half-width for recruitment, action potential duration, recruitment increment, and half-maximum recruitment. All NMBAs resulted in a significant decrease in threshold, current, and maximum upstroke velocity. Recruitment occurred at lower stimulation frequencies, and action potential duration increased. These data suggest that NMBAs decrease motor-unit excitability, which may be an important factor in the clinical muscle relaxation associated with these drugs.

Advanced Biliary Dysplasia and Intrahepatic Cholangiocarcinoma: A Systematic Review and Meta-analysis. The association between advanced biliary dysplasia (ABD) and intrahepatic cholangiocarcinoma (ICC) remains controversial. The aim of the current study is to determine if there is any association between ABD and ICC. We performed a comprehensive search of the electronic databases MEDLINE, EMBASE, CINAHL, and Cochrane Library for studies published between January 1, 2000, and August 31, 2017.
