I have several other classes that want to make extensive use of them. The class hierarchy is pretty simple, with a derived class referencing the template and calling the functions of that class, and a derived object containing an instance of the template. I'd like to extend the class with additional functionality, but I'm concerned that adding a bunch of member variables will affect how the class is referenced elsewhere. For example: class Thing { public: template static T GetThing(); }; class Foo : public Thing { public: Thing::GetThing(); }; This is obviously an example, but suppose Thing::GetThing was called from two different classes, Foo and Bar, where the first would be loaded first in a given program. If I add a member variable to Thing, I don't want it to show up in the first, but I do want it to show up in the second. Is there a way around this? Is there a best practice for this? A: Don't do this. You're creating a circular dependency and are likely to get into trouble. If the class that invokes Thing::GetThing depends on Thing, then you need to declare it final. Also, in the example you've provided, if Thing has no other functions besides GetThing, there's really no reason for it to be a template in the first place. The only reason you'd need a template in this case is if Thing has functions that do something else that is templated by T. If that's the case,
