Factors that influence gastric emptying and the effect of treatment for functional dyspepsia. The pathophysiology of functional dyspepsia is unclear but it is hypothesized that gastric emptying is altered in the pre-symptomatic stage and related to the dysfunction of an afferent neural system. In this study we examined gastric emptying by scintigraphy and factors that influence gastric emptying in 100 functional dyspepsia patients and 28 healthy volunteers. After treatment with the H2-receptor antagonist cimetidine 400 mg b.i.d. for 4 weeks, 22 of the patients were re-examined by gastric emptying study and determination of gastric accommodation to an oral water load. The delayed emptying rate in dyspepsia patients was significantly higher than that in healthy volunteers. In dyspepsia patients, the rate of gastric emptying was significantly faster when the gastric accommodation to an oral water load was positive compared to that when it was negative. Cimetidine treatment decreased the rate of gastric emptying in dyspepsia patients. Cimetidine treatment did not alter the rate of gastric emptying in healthy volunteers. The results of this study suggest that gastric emptying may be associated with the dysfunction of an afferent neural system and may be influenced by gastric accommodation.
