Mahabharata or Mahabharata is one of the two main Sanskrit ones. The first one is over 800 years old. Who exactly the creator depends on the orientation of the inscriptions, but in general it took shape about 300 years ago. Something earlier is lost due to the fact that the inscriptions simply do not keep up with the course of historical events. The early inscriptions were in Sanskrit, because by that time it had already been recognized as one of the languages of India, because now, even with all the prevalence and accessibility, there was another official language - Marathi. But what about the languages of neighboring peoples? After all, they could not fail to understand that this is the language of a great nation. About any linguistic contacts between the ancient Russians and Tamils, and even with the Indian tribes of our neighbors, we can only speak conditionally. The border, stretching for hundreds of kilometers, reigned on the earth for almost four hundred years, and having withstood it, the Eastern Territories received some peace. And since, having an advantageous position between a more developed Europe and a less developed Asia, Russia and China, on the one hand, and India on the other, or rather, with its environs, in the very center of which it was located, they began to play the role of an intermediary between the two parts of the world. It should also be noted such a detail, which for some reason they try not to notice. "Russian" or "Slavic" language in India itself was the official language, the language of the majority of the population was, in fact, "local". In the northern regions, where there were no Indian settlers, it was the language of the local population, with corresponding names like "Russian" (maha), "Slavic", which naturally had nothing to do with modern Russians. It was in such an unusual way that what is now sometimes called in the media "the poetry of the peoples of the world" turned out. Well, in general it is a single language in the original sense of the word. It was written on because it was recognized in all regions, and already further developed on its own. The languages that are currently considered to be the languages of India, including Hindi, are actually not. back in the 19th century it was a mixture of dozens of languages, moreover, quite primitive ones. There was even a case when, in one of the states, local residents in the interior of the continent mistook the language of their national minority, the Banteng, for the Hindu language. Hence the conclusion: was it not the arrival of the British colonialists in India that became one of the reasons for such a mixture? By the way, in Russian language
