5. Import the two images onto Photoshop CS3. I find that the easiest way to create a layered file in Photoshop is to import an image into the program and then open the file's options, under the File menu, and choose Create a New Layer. The image opens as a new Photoshop file and you can place it in any of the open files and change any settings to your liking. However, your changes will not be preserved when you close the file without saving it. The image that you chose to use for this tutorial is the palm tree from my photograph in Figure 1-3. It is the same tree image that I used in the previous Creating Layers tutorial, so you may have that file open already. Place it in the open file window, or open it by choosing Image > Open, and then save it. 6. Click OK. 7. Choose Image > Image Size. 8. On the Image Size dialog box's Art Size tab, select Smart Size. If your image is the size of the canvas (a full-screen selection), your photo will appear smaller in your Photoshop file. You can go to Image Size again to change it back. (The default setting isn't the best choice for larger files. For large images, I recommend the Standard size setting.) If your image is the size of a pane, your photo will appear smaller. This setting is generally used for documents and books. As a result, for a full-screen image, I recommend the Large setting. If you want the image to be a smaller size, then place it within the canvas in a pane, or change the size setting to Small. 9. Click OK. 10. Create a new layer called Tree. 11. Place the palm tree in the open pane of the Create a New Layer dialog box. 12. Click OK. Here's where things get a little tricky. I've already created a layer for the palm tree that is visible by default when you open the Layers window. If you don't see the layer for the palm tree, you probably didn't choose Create a New Layer when you imported the photo. Because the palm tree is the only element in the image, you can just place it on the canvas (as shown in Figure 4-2). 13. Right-click the tree layer.

Q: How do I call a method from another class which is being called by Qt5 QImage? So I'm doing some image processing using a C++ class which I have called 'ProcessingManager'. In a Qt5 main function I'm calling a method in this class like so: void ProcessImages(QImage* images, QImage errors, qint64* time) { ProcessingManager processingManager(images, errors, time); processingManager.DoSomething(); } But I'm getting an error saying: Cannot convert 'QImage*' to 'processingManager*' for argument '1' to 'void ProcessImages(processingManager*, QImage, qint64*)' The thing I can't understand is I'm trying to pass the pointer images, to the 'ProcessingManager' class to be able to carry on with my image processing. How can I do this? A: You should declare the method as below: void ProcessImages(ProcessingManager* pManager, QImage* images, QImage errors, qint64* time) I don't know what you mean by 'cannot convert'. It is because the function is taking a pointer of type ProcessingManager and you are trying to pass a pointer of type QImage . You need to create an object of ProcessingManager and store it in the images pointer variable. EDIT: You can also modify the function signature as below: void ProcessImages(QImage images, QImage errors, qint64 time) And you don't have to pass images as it is now a reference.
