What's new in Aura Kingdom 2:

Pioneers: Part IV Niantic, the developer behind Pokemon Go and Ingress, teamed up with Google for a nearly four year long venture that would transform the way we discover and interact with the world. Launched in 2016, their program, known for now as Project Tango, aimed to ultimately produce a set of hardware and software products used to create an augmented reality experience, but ended with its funding pulled from under them in 2016. What we had were exactly one year of hacks, experiments, and mistakes being made as they sought to deliver a system that would never see the light of day. In August of 2016, the team that worked on the project stood before the public for the very first time. In a talk decked out with color co-ordinated suits and the occasional line of Ghostbusters spirit, the result of years of progress and a seemingly limitless adventure was unveiled for the world to see: they had finally created the “magic window” that would manifest through the lens of your smartphone and display a 3D map of the world in which you can look for Pokemon on your swing set or run around in your dreams. A two year journey, the result of years of hard work and millions of dollars having been financed by a corporate giant, the device launched with a puff of recognition from seasoned journalists, undoubtedly proud to be associated with the company who had brought us useful tools for generations, Vuzix – perhaps knowing that their alignment with HTC in 2006 for the ill-fated HTC Vive headset along with their collaborative efforts in the late nineties for the first Apple iPhone represented something special. When the universe of people that could soon be holding a Tango device in their hands was quickly revealed, attention immediately turned from the progress the developers had made and what they had ended up delivering, to what everyone wanted to know. What would they be doing with it? With Project Tango no one was interested in the details. What we all wanted to know was: how many AR games were being planned? Would we be seeing augmented-reality versions of Minecraft? How are these optional features going to be handled? With no benchmark to gauge expectations, the hopes soared high and the hype came pouring in. Even as the Niantic reveal ended the anticipation continued, only gaining more momentum when the team was eventually brought to the United States and more details were revealed. August 2016 had been the start of an emotionally and financially draining year for a company that had just won the chance to do work they were longing to
