And the other thing is, and maybe this is a more useful example, is that if we go to a system where you get paid when you're under full-time, we don't have to worry about the fact that you can't attend a lot of the meetings and do a lot of the things you need to do as a government to make sure the economy is well-placed, well-managed, and productive. EDMUNDO DÍAZ: The question then, it seems to me, is how do you sustain that. That's the concern I'm hearing. How do you sustain that if you're going from baby boomers to baby boomers? HENRY WILLIAMS: We're trying to make sure it's not just a baby boomer thing. We're currently having conversations with other generations. And I think one thing that's important to remember is that... The baby boomers grew up in a world that was really different than the world in which we're living now. It was a world in which young people at that time could assume that there was
