It is estimated that around half a million women have had an abortion during the first eight weeks of pregnancy. Abortions are performed on a woman's request or if she is having difficulty becoming pregnant. In many cases, many women's abortions are initiated or induced by their physicians. But in many cases, women have abortions themselves without any outside intervention. How does the peer education on abortion play a role in all of this? In terms of peer education, a peer educator is a trained individual that educates the peers with whom he or she comes in contact. Peer education is a method of education that consists of providing information to others about an issue. In the case of abortion, peer education is done by distributing information and materials about abortion on college campuses, through social media, and in the media. A connection has been made between peer education and abortion because many people have abortions without any peer education. According to a study, half of the women who have had an abortion before the age of 18 have had no education on the topic of abortion and wanted to have abortions as young as possible. In 2009, it was found that one third of the women who have had an abortion sought to have an abortion without having any outside contacts. In the same year, it was also found that one half of the women who have had abortions were requested to have them by their parents and that almost twenty-five percent of the women who have had abortions were pressured to do so. It is apparent that peer education is necessary to make the lives of young women better. One way to create peer education about abortion is by peer educators teaching peers of all ages about the existence of abortions and the benefits of abortion in one's life. It is now very common for both male and female peers to have abortions. Therefore, peer education about abortion is more important than ever. This is why peer education about abortion is needed because it can prevent people from having abortions. Furthermore, peer education prevents women from having abortions themselves. d0c515b9f4

The main articles on this topic recently published in the Chinese Journal of Pharmacology are also summarized. Recently, surgical operations or medicines requiring micro-dose injections are generally applied. Due to the miniaturization of injectors, the injectors are gaining popularity. The injectors manufactured for surgery or medicines include a syringe in which a piston is reciprocated along an axial direction by rotation of a plunger rod or a syringe in which a liquid is sucked by a negative pressure generated by the rotation of a plunger. A syringe generally includes a barrel, a needle, a piston, and a rubber plug (airtight cap), and a syringe needle is mounted at a front end of the barrel and attached to the barrel. The rubber plug is provided at a rear end of the barrel. The rubber plug has a central hole to allow the needle to protrude, and a plurality of axially-extending recessed portions surrounding the central hole. The rubber plug provides an airtight state to prevent leakage of liquid and a gas from the barrel, and to prevent the needle from being unintentionally pulled out of the barrel. The conventional syringe is configured such that a double septum is provided at a hub for fitting the barrel and a needle cartridge is fitted into the barrel and the needle is fitted into the septum at the front end of the needle cartridge, which is fixed
