A convenient liquid may be drawn from a syringe and injected under the skin at a point different from the injection site. It is preferred that the implantable device be configured such that the liquid used for forming the channel is retained and not allowed to run out, which is generally not possible if the liquid is stored in a separate chamber or reservoir. The present invention relates generally to a method and apparatus for the delivery of therapeutics and more specifically relates to the delivery of an injectable material to the brain via a cannula extending into the brain and an appropriate intracerebral injector device. The material that is injected is
