We had a great day at the park today. We were able to catch up with our new friends and gave them many, many hugs. We took our food to them and we got together for lunch. Hopefully, this will be the only time we meet them because we will have to decide whether or not we will be able to return. Life in the Grey Zone. We are trying to keep ourselves entertained and our spirits up. We seem to feel better. Jack is a great hound and is keeping us company. Q: How to derive MySQL tables with fluent mappers' EntityFramework queries? So, I've got a terrible culture going on here at work. We're struggling to come up with how to best architect our database structure. I got bitten by the so called "ActiveRecord anti-pattern", i.e. using database objects directly (over multiple layers of abstraction). So, lets take an example of a store's entity (called Store): Store has Address, City, Country, ZipCode; Address has Country, City, Street, ZipCode Country has State, City, Locality Locality has Area Area has Town Town has Street Street has Number Number has NumberRange NumberRange has Start and Stop etc. All views have address (from the address entity), however only the "show" view (getting an id along with access to the entity itself) actually has address (and country and city) entities. Point here is that I can't figure out a proper way to inform the foreign key (address, city...) to the other tables without never actually casting the entity itself (I get the mapping already from entity set mapping). What would be the way to have association via address objects, without actually casting to a Magento object. Currently, I'm trying to ask: How can I make an query that would fetch me the country, city, state and locality (which is in a similar fashion Map Types have the important distinction of holding empty strings only). If I make some magic dynamic query, it works. But I feel that there could be found, already built, a way to make this standard, "proper" way of structuring database tables and mapping classes (or mappers) for those tables
