Richard Linklater is appearing to present his landmark film, which became the first widely discussed example of an independent film being shown theatrically and on cable networks. If the film goes on to take top prizes at the festival’s end, it is likely to become a contender for major awards at the Academy Awards, which are planned for February. At the festival, Linklater will attend a special screening of a movie his brother, Austin, is making, “Me and Earl and the Dying Girl.” The film is based on the popular young adult novel by Jesse Andrews. The Link-lers are acting as producers and they share directing credits on the film, along with Zach Bratke. The story follows an aimless high school senior in Chicago who falls in love with a girl who is dying of cancer. “Me and Earl” stars Cameron Bright as a reluctant college freshman who has trouble fitting in and becomes entangled in a criminal scheme to steal a priceless Tiffany lamp from a friend’s house. The film also stars Juno Temple, Ellar Coltrane, Betty Gilpin and Nathan Lane. Linklater is the son of actor Jack and Diane Linklater. He has directed a series of critically acclaimed films and has a long list of credits including “School of Rock,” “Dazed and Confused” and “Before Sunrise.” The festival opens Sept. 25 with the world premiere of Anne Thompson’s documentary “Henri Cartier-Bresson: The Man with the Camera.” The festival also will feature premiere screenings of “Les Misérables” and “Beasts of the Southern Wild.”Q:
