The thermal response of a 26-gauge hypodermic needle has been investigated, using finite element analysis and experimental verification. The needle is to be used for irrigation of a tissue site during surgery in which the site can move, and the needle can be held under tension. The effects of external loads and external fields, as well as internal gradients of temperature, have been examined. The analysis has shown that a small length of tissue (less than 0.5 mm) can cool from 52 degrees C to 38 degrees C in 4.4 seconds with an air stream of 0.05 m/s. This represents a sufficient time-scale for the needle to be held under tension while cooling the tip of the needle. In the finite element analysis, the maximum temperature change at the tip of the needle of 5.9 degrees C was achieved after a 20-second period of exposure to the air stream. The experimental investigation, using a needle of 0.75 mm diameter, showed a cooling time of 2.8 seconds.NMR studies of nanoscale processes and interactions in mammalian cells and tissues. NMR is a physical method that has been widely used in biological systems to investigate structure, dynamics, and molecular-level properties in biologically relevant systems for more than two decades. Since its inception, it has developed into a unique non-invasive technique providing unique insights into the dynamics of nuclei, their interactions, and their distribution on the molecular level. A major application of NMR in mammalian biology has been the study of proteins, peptides, carbohydrates, lipids, and ions. However, the application of these methods to more complex systems has become more common over the last decade. Here, we focus on the application of NMR as a method to investigate the distribution and dynamics of macromolecules in cells, cells in tissue, and living organisms. The diverse nature of macromolecules, from proteins to nucleic acids, has meant that NMR provides an equally varied variety of insights into their functions and interactions in these systems.b)(1) to impose a late filing penalty, and we note that the latter regulation contains the language that "[t]he date, expressed in calendar years, that a
