The annual Mobile World Congress in Barcelona is where phone manufacturers, network providers and the European Telecommunications Standards Institute (ETSI) — the group which governs 3G technology — set out new plans, guidelines and standards for the year ahead. But perhaps the biggest announcement is always reserved for the night before the show takes place. That's when the United States' own version, Mobile World Congress, takes place in Las Vegas. And sometimes, it's the biggest news unveiled. Amazon has joined the race to make smartphones for the world's largest smartphone market. The online retail giant says it's developing a series of devices that will run on its Fire OS, a platform designed to be a simple and clean alternative to Android. The move is part of Amazon's assault on the mobile phone market, having just launched its first smartphone for the very lucrative Chinese market.

Fire OS is expected to be compatible with other services and devices from Amazon, including its Kindle e-books and streaming Amazon Instant Video service. “We’ve been working closely with Amazon for the last two years, and we’re very happy to finally be able to announce Amazon Fire,” said Michel Combes, vice president for next generation mobile at Nokia. “Amazon Fire is an innovative product that offers users a whole new experience. They will continue to develop and innovate on top of our open-source, Linux-based operating system, and we’re excited about bringing this to market.” Nokia is expected to unveil its own software platform, ClearOS, at its press conference on Tuesday. The company has already had a preview of its mobile OS, and it's expected to officially release it to the public in the summer time. The company is also expected to
