The 3% body fat club They are the lucky ones. The three percent. When you find one. That they are. They walk with a certain air, they have a calm demeanor and most important, they have no desire to lose any more pounds. But for them, there is more to life than the pursuit of calories in and out. "I think they've actually lost weight on purpose," says Dr. Susan Edelberg, an R.N. and assistant professor of medicine at the University of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia. “They have discipline.” They have determination. The recipe for success, she says, is discipline, self-discipline. Find a way to have even two hours of exercise a day, and do it consistently. They have found that the endorphin high they feel from exercise lasts for hours, fueling their energy level throughout the day. Remember, it’s about fitting in that two-hour exercise time. They eat healthy. When they do eat something sugary or fatty, they make sure it is low in calories and high in nutrients. They appreciate a life. They realize now that when they were younger, being active was difficult. But they don’t worry about that now. They realize that when they were younger, they’d be happy to wake up and have

They know they can eat a little less than they wanted to when they first started. "As you get older, you want to cut back on calories," she says. "The three percent, even when they're older, they're healthy and active — they just want to take it easy." They are the minority. They aren't growing in numbers. But they are being found by those of us who aren't privileged enough to be considered part of this group. Maybe you're one of them. Maybe you are just starting to understand it. Or maybe it's been happening for a long time. One of the things that Dr. Edelberg has observed is that at least half of her patients have given up trying to lose weight. She says that their quest for a “healthy weight” is now
