"Weekend fun fact Your Body's Own Shampoo Deep in your skin resides the largest organ in your body: your skin. It is made up of two layers, the epidermis and dermis, and is permeable to oxygen, blood, lymph, and nerves. When your skin becomes irritated from perspiration, soap, and other agents, it creates acidic waste products that must be sloughed off. This sloughed off matter settles in the pockets in the skin, or clefts. Over time, many of these clefts become filled with dead skin, bacteria, and other debris. Your body then acts as a self-cleaning enzyme, and sloughs it off, resulting in dryness. This is why most people require more frequent washing. Your body then produces a natural antibacterial agent: squalene. The squalene is isolated from the cream you use to clean your face. This cream (not shower cream) contains a high amount of this antibacterial agent because it has only to do its job once. The beauty industry has taken notice of this natural antibacterial substance, and has synthesized it into a product called AquaCleans, which is a soap made with water, and also contains an antibacterial agent called Palmitic acid. AquaCleans (commercially known as Aqualyx) is on the market for over 10 years and was made with the idea that you can wash your skin 100 times a day (or at least every second day) and not have to use soap. AquaCleans is a companion product to your shower gel. There is one problem with this product: it doesn't category of games which have the basic characteristics of an RPG. As gamers around the world keep experiencing the unique game play of this genre, the story in and out becomes a form of art that continuously appeals to players like us. RPG story where choosing the appropriate kind of actions while meeting the different situations and events that transpire are deciding factors. This is what defines RPG. Therefore, the execution of such elements is judged on how it changes and adapts to the player throughout the game. Of course, I mean that the dynamic system of the game can change by expanding the number of choices. “The system can change by expanding the number of choices” Players who are used to making choices in other genres like MMORPG or shooters in the genre of RPGs already know this as the “Limitless System”. When compared to other genres where the game screen is limited and unable to expand, the Limitless system of the RPG is a unique characteristic that relies on a dynamic gameplay system where the universe around players expand and change as the
