endangered large mammalian species in Southeast Asia. Elephants are a large-body part of the landscape and have been heavily affected by anthropogenic activities, such as oil palm plantation development. Little is known about the early changes in the elephant skull in response to a land-use change. The present study quantified morphological changes in the elephant skull in response to the industrialization of an oil palm plantation. The changes were quantified by calculating the relative shape changes of the skull before and after the anthropogenic impact. An additive geometric morphometric analysis revealed clear differences in the shape of the skull between the elephant group and the elephant group in the oil palm plantation. Our results support the hypothesis that the oil palm plantation has influenced the shape of the elephant skull. Because the changes were found in the current elephant generation, it can be expected that the ecological and social impact of the oil palm will persist in the population for the next one or two generations. The present invention relates to a new and distinctive soybean variety designated XB28AB10, which has been the result of years of careful
