Marine bulkhead joints can range from partially rusted, requiring only removal of rust and application of a joint sealant, through to critical weld joints, requiring plasmoid coating and weld repair, through to hot work welds requiring welding, such as hydro-brazing and explosive welding, requiring application of a sealant, all of which require that seals be applied to the bulkhead to prevent ingress of water into the vessel and to prevent evaporation of water into the atmosphere. Bulkhead joints are provided in any of a variety of geometric configurations, such as vertical, horizontal or at an angle. In all of these joints, application of a sealant is essential to reduce corrosion and assure the integrity of the bulkhead. Seals for marine bulkhead joints should adhere to the metal of the bulkhead to form an effective and resilient seal and should be resistant to a variety of weathering conditions including corrosion, ultraviolet light, electrical discharges, salt spray, such as is encountered in various marine environments. Because the metal to be sealed is generally other than the sealant, a two component sealant is usually required, one of which is known as the base. The base serves to wet the surface of the bulkhead and generally adhere the sealant to the bulkhead. A cured sealant serves to maintain the integrity of the seal and the base should adhere to the base so as to avoid the need for repeated application of the base after the sealant cures. In addition to fulfilling these requirements, the sealants should flow sufficiently under moderate pressure and not leave voids or striations when cured so as to form an unbroken seal. The present commercially available sealants used for marine bulkhead joints are gel-like sealants based on nitrile-butadiene polymer, chlorinated rubber, polyure

(The movie Ra One also has some similarities with the plot of the novel Chup Chup Ke.Piston setup: the head-gasket area will need to be cleaned out and.170-.205" graphite filler put in for every piston that will wear. The filler will be pumped around the chambers with an accurate pump. Let me know if you have other questions that I can't answer here. This is a really good build you've got here. I'd imagine that the compression ratio is around 15-16.5:1. For the valves, I wonder whether you'll have any problems with them changing over time with a tight compression ratio and the rod bearing seat wearing against the side of the head. Have you considered getting a DBA valve lifter or similar in the future to stop that wearing? You might also want to make sure that the valves are closing against the piston rather than the tube as the head and the engine will heat up while idling. Well I've tried the the copper rod for one of the valves. But
