They were (in my recollection) the most glorious of video rental experiences to be had, back before services like Netflix and RedBox. They were a complete and utter departure from the mundane experience of a VCR in the early 80s, which usually meant a night of watching Doctor Who followed by a nap, before waking up around midnight to find yourself behind in the episode you came in on. (Hey, no judgment, I would have been a similar beast in a previous era.) By 1995, the Blockbuster Video stores were shuttering in the United States (and in 1993, Canada, too). The video rental business was replaced by a world of online services like Netflix, and while a few late-in-life Blockbusters have popped up under the name "Redbox" or "Blockbuster Video", the promise of the "good old days" of the video-rental counter is fading. Here are a few ways we can bring some of the good old days back to our homes. The Redbox Round Button The Coors Keg was hardly a technology advancement, and it's been making cold, clear-headed fiends of us for decades. But if you're buying a new set of IKEA furniture, you may as well stock up on a few Redbox Round Buttons and a new VCR, too. These tiny little checkboxes are the domain of Redbox, and they're the perfect little add-on to your media equipment. Should you want to watch something, you can lift the button up and select from one of several popular shows or movies. When you're done, press down on the button and it reseals itself. And you don't even have to leave the house. The Redbox Instant While this isn't a broadcasted service (or at least not one that looks like a broadcasted service), it's a quick and dirty substitute for watching a video that's renting in a store. Redbox Instant offers more than 500 streaming content providers, and you can get access to a selection of movies and TV shows by signing up for a 7-day free trial. You can then purchase a 30
