Although the production and consumption processes are interdependent, little has been written to investigate the innovative and creative process that bridges both of them. This paper aims to fill this gap by examining how an innovative television programme (process) led to the new design of the coffee machines (product). The study followed a case study design where the author collected and analysed data through three methods: semi-structured interviews, participant observation and thematic analysis. The collected data were then further analysed using constructivist theory to explore the creative and innovative nature of the programme. The findings demonstrate that this innovative programme not only had a positive influence on the production process of the new design for the coffee machines, but also the participants developed understanding of the creative and innovative processes that is the basis of any invention. This paper demonstrates that the creative and innovative process plays an important part in the sustainability of the product. Design innovation can help firms to save energy and cut carbon emissions. But it can also help our economy to become more competitive. This paper hopes to stimulate more research on this important topic. To this end, I have concluded by highlighting some of the aspects of the sustainable process for product design.
