Kenya and Bangladesh seal multimillion-dollar grain deal Kenya and Bangladesh have concluded a multimillion-dollar deal to provide cereals to the country's poor and boost its farmer incomes, underscoring the importance of the East African country to the global grain market. While the deal between the government of Kenya and the Bangladeshi Embassy in Nairobi to buy in bulk and distribute to small-scale grain growers has not been officially signed, Commerce Minister James Mwangi has confirmed the plan and said a memorandum of understanding was sealed on Friday. A source told IRIN the value of the deal was worth about $51 million over four years. Bangladesh is one of the fastest-growing economies in Asia and is increasingly a force in grain markets. It is also a major exporter of rice to the global market. Mwangi told IRIN that Kenya will purchase up to 700,000 tonnes of grain from Bangladesh annually in the next four years. "The agreement is great because we can help small scale farmers, many of whom have been driven off their land," said Mwangi. While many in East Africa have limited access to food, the price of maize has risen faster than that of wheat, and is four times that of rice. "This is due to a drought in East Africa, which has wiped out the wheat crop. Although the bulk of Kenya's maize is imported, the country has a large requirement. With the drought, we will be importing a lot," said Mwangi. "But we are also going to use the maize to pay the farmers the money they are due from the maize they have produced for the government." Mwangi said Kenya is already buying from neighbouring Uganda and elsewhere in East Africa to meet its own requirements. "We have a number of programmes to help small scale farmers, though we cannot do all the work. We also need to share what they have produced with those farmers who want them. We want to ease them out of poverty." The plan comes after a government visit by President Uhuru Kenyatta in October 2012, which led to Kenyan authorities confirming its intention to buy from farmers and distribute it to poor people. "That was the first time the president visited the area. We told him we were going to buy the grain we needed and he gave us his blessing
