Islamâ€”Indonesiaâ€”21st One of the key concepts in analysing the content of this text is its relationship to the source genre of the nisba (systematic/regular use of a nominal to show derivation). This text presents two aspects of the nisba: (a) the use of the nisba to convey the implication of derivation and (b) the use of the nisba to convey another meaning that is implied in many nisbas such as the word 'Faiz' (eg. Google analytics more expensive.Q: What are the statistics of mutex deadlocks? What are the statistics of mutex deadlocks? I have only had a simple race-free single-threaded C program which deadlocks. But I think a deadlock should be most likely to happen when the two conflicting threads are well balanced: I have only one thread which is never even 10% of the CPU time.

Therefore, I do think that the deadlock rate is small (perhaps it is between 1 and 10 times $1/100$). How could I test this theory in a real application? Because I couldn't imagine that a program is small enough to ignore this. A:

It depends a lot on how you are measuring it, and not much on the amount of CPU time either thread does. First I'd want to understand a deadlock to know how to measure it. Using a traditional operating system debugger to watch processes and threads interact on a single machine can tell you a lot. Each system will work differently and you will want to develop good methods. If you don't do that you will get bashed by the crowd and your process will be the one left out in the cold. It's well worth the effort. A: Ok, after a long discussion with Herb Sutter (the question author) and Manuel Vlachos (who wrote the original deadlock article), I received an answer: well, there's a reason why the term "deadlock" is associated with a peculiar sort of state. The maximum likelihood of a deadlock arises when two threads (A and B) are in contention for a mutual exclusion lock, and one thread (B) is currently blocked on that lock. If thread A happens to hold a lock on a mutex which protects a critical region, and thread B is presently blocking on the same
