The elimination of rush hours also had a positive impact on mail services. By avoiding the worst congestion, mail was able to make its delivery even more efficient. In addition, mail carriers could now do their routes at a slower pace without getting behind schedule. The next phase of development had a focus on delivering mail to the households, rather than just bringing it to the sorting facility. This change in thinking would have a tremendous impact on how the USPS operated its sorting facilities. Additionally, the thinking behind the changes was based on the results of a five-year-long study conducted by an independent consulting company. This study, called the Rand report, was first released in 1969. Due to the Rand report, the USPS stopped sorting mail during daylight hours, and began sorting
