The new motion and animation technology that powers FIFA 22 includes: A new kind of ball physics that adds more fluidity and physicality to the ball, as well as more variety of ball types and movement patterns; New movement templates that drastically improve speed, fluidity and precision of player movements, with a variety of speed, spin, power and body positions; Assist gestures, which add animation to your players' explosive movements and give them the ability to pitch the ball in a variety of ways; A new all-star team, featuring the most famous, skillful and talented players in the world, and new tactics and strategy game modes; Improved squad position detection that provides a more realistic result, making smarter decisions easier; The new "Target Pass" feature, which adds fluidity to the game's passing sequences; "Precision Move" and "Lurking Man" tools, which allow you to influence opponent's gameplay without being detected; and The "FIFA Ultimate Team" card content which lets you progress your virtual and real-life team into the game. FIFA 20 had the new "Tactical Free-Kick" system, which allows you to perfectly use your free-kicks. You can control your free-kick choice, height of the free-kick, and angle of the goal area, each having their own timing and positioning constraints. New tactics now let you adjust the strategy of your free-kick delivery, such as your chosen height, which will improve your accuracy of the kick itself. In FIFA 21, improvements were made to the AI tactics, resulting in a more realistic performance from the game's AI opponents. You can now choose different tactical formations to adapt to your opponents, and a player's physical fitness can affect their tactics when coming into the game. The new "Set Piece" feature for game modes allows you to control the direction of your free-kicks, and it's now possible to control the AI behaviour when being fouled when the goal area is just outside the box. How is FIFA 22 designed to maximize its multiplayer features? Our ambitions for FIFA 22 focus on continued improvements to the single-player experiences and scoring. However, our ambitions for multiplayer go much further than that, including new player models, match formations, improved player movement, and new close-
