Feeding behaviors and growth in beef cattle. Selectivity of feed intake is important to overall animal productivity and commercial viability of producers. Therefore, feeder cattle should select feed with minimum maintenance requirements. In general, any feedstuff tends to satisfy maintenance requirements because its chemical composition is similar to the composition of other feedstuffs and the energy density is similar for all feedstuffs. However, chemical components of feedstuffs differ in the extent to which they satisfy maintenance requirements. One such component is crude protein. On the basis of laboratory studies, the protein composition of diets for calves has been shown to be a major factor in the production of subcutaneous fat. Therefore, diets containing high-quality protein for calves should be available for the first 2 to 3 months of life. The selection of the most appropriate milk replacer for dairy calves is also a component of feeder selection. Appropriate milk replacer should have low levels of fat and protein, which will help ensure maximal growth rate and growth efficiency. A combination of factors should be considered when selecting feed for growing cattle. For example, appropriate ingredient selection will ensure that feed is fed within available roughage levels on the basis of the minimum maintenance requirement. Supplementation of feedstuff with dietary protein or energy will guarantee adequate nutrient intake above the minimum requirements. Because of the limited quantity of the digestive tract, even if diets are isonitrogenous, the effect of restricting feed energy will be greater than the effect of restricting protein. Therefore, research should be conducted to select appropriate diets, feedstuffs, or both... et al. (2000) Nucl. Phys. B. Proc. Suppl., 86, 369. Aoki, T. (2001) J. Phys. G., 27, 39. Aoki, T.
