When doing a PARTITION BY (SOME-COLUMN), we normally have the partition key be less than or equal to the number of partitions. This means that when we insert a row, it is guaranteed to go into one of the partitions and it is also guaranteed to be the last row in that partition. However, are there any advantages to using a partition variable that is larger than the number of partitions? I know that using an index can be helpful for speedier query plans, and also enables partition pruning. Does this come into play in any other way? A: When using "partition by" function for partitioning we aim to get exact partition by ordering and inserting/selecting by that ordering as well. So we would expect each partition to contain data within same order. If you have more partitions than number of rows for one partition, then whole subset of rows is spread across several partitions. This might lead to missing or duplicated rows within partitions. To cope with this, one solution to choose partitioning column within range equal to number of rows plus some multiple of number of partitions, e.g. 100% of rows per partition as you said. However, database engine is designed in many levels of optimisation. So it might choose to insert other rows first before partitioning. This could cause a bug for your application which expects every row into single partition. With partitioning on a key, you can use partition pruning to avoid duplicating values and improve performance. Key partitioning allows you to partition a table over several keys. Not all database engines support key partitioning however. For example, if table is partitioned over three primary keys,
