Molecular characterisation of Neisseria meningitidis isolates in South African military medical laboratories during 2003-2005. Twenty-eight meningococcal isolates were recovered from clinical specimens (blood, cerebrospinal fluid (CSF) and synovial fluid) from 21 soldiers that presented with meningitis between 1 November 2003 and 30 June 2005. Following characterisation of the isolates, the majority (76%) of isolates had serogroup W-135. A significant proportion of isolates (43%) contained resistance to penicillin. In addition, the isolates were resistant to chloramphenicol (21%), ciprofloxacin (29%), and rifampicin (21%). Fifteen percent of isolates were resistant to cefotaxime and 14% to ciprofloxacin and chloramphenicol. The sequencing of the cps (capsule) gene was performed on 27 isolates, resulting in a sequence that was >99% similar to sequences from the UK and other countries. The sequence data was submitted to GenBank and compared to sequences from the GenBank database. The strains were mainly grouped in one clonal lineage within serogroup W, subgroup C and had not recombined with a capsule gene from other clonal lineages. In conclusion, there are high rates of carriage of penicillin-resistant N. meningitidis, and there was no evidence that the observed results were caused by the introduction of a new clone during the 2003-2005 period.

Embryonic stem (ES) cell fate specification is governed by a dynamic epigenetic landscape that is tuned by a variety of different signaling pathways and developmental signals. However, the transcriptional and epigenetic events that regulate this plasticity have not been fully determined. The few histone modifier enzymes that are known to function within the ES cell epigenetic landscape have been shown to have differential effects on ES cell pluripotency and self-renewal depending on the substrate and cell type. Here, we investigate the role of the histone methyltransferase G9a in pluripotency maintenance and ES cell epigenetic reprogramming and show that G9a acts as an integral regulator of ES cell fate specification and pluripotency in ES cells. Induction of G9a increases the accessibility of the Nanog and Oct4 promoter regions and enhances ES cell commitment. Overexpression of G9a maintains the ES cell transcriptional network of Oct4, Nanog, Sox2, and Tcfcp2l1 at the expense of the alternative cell fate identity. G9a also cooperates with Suz12 to activate the pluripotency transcriptome during ES cell differentiation. In contrast, the histone demethylase Kdm6a specifically recognizes and demethylates H3K9me2 and suppresses Nanog and Esrrb expression during differentiation and ES cell self-renewal. Altogether, these results demonstrate that G9a and Kdm6a are critical epigenetic regulators of ES cell fate specification and maintenance of the ES cell fate.

Abstract The ERK1/2 and Janus kinase (JAK) signaling pathways control ES cell pluripotency through the maintenance of expression levels of the pluripotency transcription factors Nanog and Oct4, respectively. Here, we investigate the role of the G9a histone methyltransferase in the maintenance of ES cell pluripotency and pluripotency-related gene expression. We demonstrate that the differentiation of G9a-expressing ES cells is impaired, due to sustained Nanog and Oct4 expression, and that G9a induces the differentiation of these cells via induction of the transcription factor Gfi1. In addition, we show that G9a is regulated by the JAK/Stat signaling pathway and that inhibition of ERK1/2 signaling results in G9a up-regulation. Furthermore, the maternally expressed gene Nanog is directly targeted by G9a
