What are you waiting for?Visit Now!Greenness, usually understood as a measure of plant health and/or photosynthetic activity, is a measurable and quantifiable process and thus, when measured, may indicate the quality of the air, trees and other plants in a defined area. The measurement of greenness of a defined area is similar to measuring pH, or the amount of acidity, or the amount of alkalinity in the area. Plants absorb carbon dioxide and emit oxygen during photosynthesis, and as a result greenness correlates to levels of carbon dioxide and oxygen. Carbon dioxide is a greenhouse gas, and oxygen is a respiratory gas. Therefore, greenness is representative of the levels of carbon dioxide and oxygen in an area. Greenness levels, the quality of oxygen and carbon dioxide levels in the air, or the amount of plant photosynthesis, also indicate how much carbon dioxide is being taken up by the plants, and is also indicative of the CO₂ levels in the leaves of the plants. Further, plants absorb nutrients and water from the environment through roots and thus change the chemistry of the soil in which they grow. Plants absorb nitrogen, phosphorus, potassium, and other chemicals through the surface of their leaves. Greenness levels are thus a measure of the level of these nutrients and chemical nutrients in the soil in which the plants are growing. The current method of measuring greenness is to simply visually estimate the amount of plant foliage in a defined area in the shape of a rectangle, a square, a circle, etc. and then calculate the percent of foliage. This process is subject to wide variances of measurement, of course. Greenness can be measured based on the wavelength response of a video camera or of photosynthetic pigments. For example, cyanidin-chlorophyll a-b binding protein (CCP), and the electron transport system (ETS) of chlorophyll a and b and chlorophyll a-heme complex are some examples of photosynthetic pigments known in the art. CCP, in particular, is a protein in the light-harvesting complex. Studies of the interactions between CCP and the pigments of photosystem II and studies of the protein have demonstrated that CCP is associated with photosynthetic complexes and functions in the photochemistry of photosynthesis, particularly in electron transfer and energy regulation. affection Opposites attract - as any relationship counsellor can tell you. So many women will only look at men the way a boy might regard a fuzzy creature after they meet a few ones, while males find it hard to get past the hormones, assuming they do not meet her gender. Ed David Sloan is about to face his fate, but is he ready for love in all its magnificent glory? To his credit he has a seasoned girlfriend, although he is still learning how to take what she says, instead of his dad's theories and his granddad's tales. All the same he doubts he could satisfy a woman after wrestling with his conscience to do what he does to raise money for cancer research. In his next life he would have to, would he? Not only does his mother die of cancer, but his dad, and his grandma, though a mixture of chemotherapy and dedication from the staff of the hospital finally brings her back from the brink of death. But, he still has a part to play, as the Christmas list will come up again, and unless he can provide better than a chicken lube he will find himself
