Thursday, 1 April 2016 The Arab Spring in Russia The last few years have seen a slew of massive anti-government protests in Russia, from the massive demonstrations in 2011, to the city-wide riots of 2013. The goal of these protests has been the slow dilution of Russia's power through a peaceful political struggle. The strategy of their opponents has been to stage demonstrations and sit-ins, but in the end, the goal was to peacefully replace a corrupt and semi-authoritarian regime with a more democratic one. To their opponents, this was a peaceful revolution. But not to the government. In order to head off what they saw as a revolution against the state, the Kremlin decided that a completely different and violent strategy was needed. The government's tactic was to not simply crush the protest, but in some cases, to execute those who took part. The state media regularly vilifies those who support these protests, depicting them as "agents of Western foreign secret services", an approach so dark that one Russian state official called the protests "armed insurgency". For Russia, the effect has been a dangerous backlash. A Russian analyst claimed that the protests which took place in 2012 and 2013 were the largest since the end of the Communist Party's rule in 1991. Even if one disregards official Russian data, the large number of protests and strikes in 2014 suggests that large numbers of people are taking part in the new wave of protests. Not only is this not something that is going to help the Russian economy or any other part of the economy, this could even play into the hands of Vladimir Putin. Let's talk about the economy first. Russian growth has been sliding for over four years now, and the global financial crisis has been exacerbated by the fall in the price of oil and the swing from growth to contraction in the world economy. Even before the 2008 economic crisis, the Russian economy was in dire straits. In fact, the worst
