A new approach to entrap heavy metal ions in liposomes is developed. It allows the manufacturing of highly loaded liposomes in an electrochemical reactor. The loading and the release from liposomes of any metal ion is not disturbed by the electrophoresis occurring during the two main steps of the preparation: lysis of the liposomes and separation between the buffer and the metallic solution. This electrochemical method is consistent with pH gradients and anodic or cathodic components, which yields high concentrations of metals in the vesicles. The in situ loaded liposomes have the same physicochemical properties as the empty liposomes (size, zeta-potential, contents of the lipid layer, melting properties). The stability of the entrapped metal ion is studied using 1.5mM (37g/L) copper sulfate solution as an example. The spatial distribution of copper in the liposomes and a low release of the metal is reported when the liposome is electrically polarized with a current of 10-500 mA/cm<sup>2</sup> for 8 h. A complete cationic-anionic exchange is shown on the surface of the inner layer of the liposome by atomic force microscopy. Only in the case of the lysis reaction of the liposome induced by pH 6.5, copper release from liposomes reaches a value higher than 75% of the maximum concentration.Differential functional capacity of multimeric forms of the class I HLA-DR molecules in CD4+ T cells. The role of the class II molecules in the recognition by CD4+ T cells was examined. To that end, three tetrameric forms of HLA-DR molecules were constructed by display of class II alpha- and beta-chains from Raji cells as glutathione S-transferase fusion proteins in E. coli. These tetramers were called DRalpha-beta1,
