The mission is to be known as BepiColombo, and it's targeted to launch in 2018. As part of the mission, two spacecraft—one around 16 feet wide, the other a bit larger than a small motorcycle—will orbit the Moon, waiting for a near-Earth asteroid that will be near to Earth's orbit. An even bigger spacecraft, the size of a tennis court, will fly around the asteroid. The three spacecraft will close in on the asteroid and the Earth, moving it into the Earth's path. Then the Earth and the two spacecraft will come together, and the spacecraft will fly back in the opposite direction through the same path. "BepiColombo's current architecture was developed in a highly collaborative process within ESA," Simonetta Di Pello, head of the BepiColombo Science Operations Team, said in a statement. "The initial system concept has been through rigorous analysis, and the result is a very robust design, which is hard to accomplish without broad international collaboration." Exploring near-Earth asteroids is a logical next step for the Europeans, as they began long-term observations of the moon back in the 1970s. The European Space Agency (ESA) has also been working on the long-term observations of the moon. The first European astronaut, German astronaut Thomas Reiter, has been living on the International Space Station since March of last year. The ISS's habitation module has been filled with food and equipment needed for continued operations, even though there are currently no plans to go back to the moon. Exploring near-Earth asteroids was also a possibility for NASA, but the agency canceled its similar asteroid exploration mission in 2015, after it estimated it wouldn't have enough money left in its budget for a launch in 2018. In the same vein, the U.S. began a similar project, but has had problems meeting funding deadlines. NASA's goal is to send humans to asteroids by 2025, in part so they can study them up close and build technology
